By Rich Rifkin Unfortunately, no one in Davis is celebrating the centennial of our fair city this month. But they should be. The reason you're here and I'm here and virtually every member of our community who now lives here is due to what began 100 years ago, on March 18, 1905. That was our Fourth of July, the day Davisville started to become Davis. That day, Gov. George C. Pardee signed the bill, composed by Peter J. Shields, that authorized the founding of a

The recent debate over the design of Fifth Street between B and L streets has featured the two issues of safety and traffic flow. The back-and-forth conversation has centered on questions of accident reduction and vehicle volume. As important as these two matters obviously are, preoccupation with them neglects a looming third aspect: Fifth Street between B and L is an ugly, hard and alienated corridor. It is a four-lane industrial highway more than a livable and pleasant city street.

Phyllis Haig's family has been involved in Davis libraries from the very beginning. The beginning, in this case, came in 1872 when the town of Davisville was only four years old. Haig's great-great-grandmother, Mrs. William H. Marden, collected books in the upper floor of her home to lend to residents. Marden and Mrs. F.G. Crawford were among the first citizens of the new town and were committed to creating a library. In 1904, a traveling library permit was

On April 5, 1906, the State Farm Commission named Davisville as the site of a university farm, which of course, came to be called UC Davis and changed the course of history for this small railroad village. To commemorate the momentous decision's centennial, city and university leaders will present a brief ceremony Wednesday, from 4:30 to 4:50 p.m., coinciding with the exact hour of the board's decision. The event will take place on the north patio of Third

Holiday festivities of yore will be celebrated Saturday and again Saturday, Dec. 30, at the Hattie Weber Museum, 445 C St. in downtown Davis. Using a Dec. 30, 1898, article in The Davisville Enterprise as a guide, all children visiting the museum between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. those two Saturdays will receive a sack of holiday goodies with an 1898 flair. The article has been enlarged by Davis historian John Lofland and will be exhibited at the museum. Due to changes in the times, customs and
